...arrangements in the locking block system to permit a train to pass into the block: it does not get away from the human element, and I think that you are safer without it, when we expect we have something and find that it is not there. Chairman Wood: You think you are safer without the electrical connection I Mr. Rose: Yes, sir. My reasons are that we expect this, we are not familiar with it. that we have some additional protection and it is not there when we want it. I have had some experience and find that some of our electrical contraptions are a bluff and they are monkeyed with and get out of order. Mr. Houghton: Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct one impression that has been possibly given here; that is in regard to its not requiring but one man to make a mistake in the manual block system. That is, the telegraph block system was called the telegraph block system until last spring, but was changed to the manual block system; but it takes two men to secure the block, and they have got to go through a more comprehensive preliminary arrangement than the locking block requires. With the locking block you can press a button and the man at the other end, if he is lying down. could use his foot; but with the manual block system the operator has to call the next man, tell him what he wants; that requires two men just the same as it is in the locking block. Chairman Wood: We will let Mr. Hovey, who is with the Block Signal and Train Control Board of the Interstate Commerce Commission and whom we have engaged to advise us on this subject, give his views. Mr. Hovey: My understanding of the situation is this: Shall we use the telegraph block, which the majority of roads now have installed, or shall we use some other system--the other two systems being the contr...
